

I wanted to comment on the FCC's expansion of Low Power FM (LPFM) radio stations. This will have a detrimental effect on radio stations using FM translator services. I listen to a local radio station 91.1 K-LOVE which uses the FM translator technology and the radio will be sorely missed if it is not able to continue. This radio station provides a type of programming that is not available on other radio stations. The type of programming that comes from K-Love is a community building and very uplifting type of programming which is in stark contrast to much of the negativity that you hear on most forms of media today. I believe removing this programming from the local airwaves will have a detrimental effect as many listeners will have to turn to other less encouraging and positive types of radio programming.

Thanks,
